Not illustrated. 1886 Excerpt: .molecules, the motion of the dielectric which the disappearance of the stress produces will be much less violent. Whether the discharge of the electric energy takes place by radiation or by the decomposition of the molecules will evidently depend very much upon the nature of the gas; if the gas is one whose particles are easily dissociated, then we should expect the discharge to take place chiefly by the decomposition of the molecules; if, however, the molecules are dissociated with great difficulty then we shall expect the discharge to take place chiefly by radiation. From what we have said, it will be seen that the discharge is more likely to take place by decomposition at the negative than at the positive electrode; so that we may have a case where the discharge is by one means at one electrode and by the other at the other...
