Not illustrated. 1863 Excerpt: .conditions of admission do not seem to have been demanded before the bar was constituted into a real corporation, and the agency of lawyers raised to a public function. In Justinian s time, five years of legal study were required for the lawyer, at the end of which he was examined. From A. D. 468, the candidate was further required to testify that he was penetrated by the holiness of the mysteries of the Catholic religion, under penalty, in case of infraction, of a perpetual exile and the confiscation of his property. Furthermore, the admission to pleading was subordinate to the special license of the Emperor. These guaranties of capacity and religious orthodoxy made neither orators nor jurisconsults. The science, stuffed with subtilties, died, as had, several centuries previously, the art of oratory. From Constantine to Justinian the lawyers were divided into regulars, or statuti, and...
