The desire was to enter into fellowship with the great thinkers of the past and their thoughts; and, in this way to rise to their ideals, and understand the objects they had in view in their studies. The results ended in this direction, that philosophers had to be conceived as particular thinkers, all studying from their own standpoints; all individualistic as related to their messages of truth to mankind; all animated by high ideals and far-reaching general conceptions; and, all failing to discover that harmony and unity in the universe which could be accepted by true thinkers. What was pointed out in that book tended in this direction: it was impossible, in the nature of things, that they could come to an agreement; being independent empiric thinkers, they were all as the refracting rays of divine truth, but there was no divine synthesis to bring their conceptions into the pure light of truth. It is by the means of science that the spectrum of truth is being realised; and it is by divine wisdom, as found in Christ, and his method of thought in the spirit, that the great synthesis may be expected to take place. The disciples of wise teachers are still saying, Let us make tabernacles for our wise philosophers ; but the divine voice is saying, This is My beloved Son:...
