Excerpt: . . . receptacle and as the positive electrode. (The alkaline nitrates melt at about 200 C. , but do not decompose until at from 1000 to 1200 C. Up to this point not only do they not attack metal vessels which contain them, but they appear, on the contrary, to have the singular property of preventing oxidation by fire, or at least of retarding the same considerably.) The coke is held by an iron wire which also serves as a terminal. With the nitrate in a fused state a current of E. M. F. from 1 to 2 volts is produced. If instead of nitrate in fusion an aqueous solution of the salt be employed, the poles are reversed. In fact, in an iron-carbon couple using a solution of soda or potash nitrate the iron is positive and acts like the zinc in the ordinary...
