Excerpt: . . . in this country of the Ecole des Beaux Arts of Paris. The teachings of the great French ateliers have been the ideal of the American instruction, and the faculty has been imbued with their spirit while men like Despradelle have been the direct links between the Institute and the Beaux Arts. And the a structure truly noble and dignified. Rogers Building is itself a fine example which cannot fail to have stimulating of the earliest influence exerted in this influence on the students who gather country by the famous French school, within its halls. By W. P. RICHARDSON Cornell University Editors Note. For a number of years Mr. Richardson has been actively interested in chemistry of many different types. At present he is acting in the capacity of Head Chemist for the Cornell Wood Products Company of Cornell, Wisconsin. the makers of the well-known Cornell Wall Board. His experience with this company and that with other paper and pulp mills in the country makes him especially fit to write on the subject of wood pulp and its manufacture. Paper enters into the life of every person every day and it is highly desirable that everyone have at least some idea of a few of the processes it goes through before it is placed on the market and reaches the consumer. The following is a simple and instructive summary of the four common processes of the manufacture of wood pulp. APER, when examined closely,...
